

Curse

I can feel my mind quickly wasting away.

Let me rewind, as to tell you the beginning of this story. It was a dark and gloomy Sunday night, no light, spare our moon's. Yours truly pattered his well-dressed self down fifth avenue, without care or particular reason; repetitive motion for which myself now regrets upmost. These eyes found themselves landing on one poorly wretched old woman, her hand outstretched, palming merely three quarters. Characterized by wealth, she targeted with direct intent. Requesting monetary aid generated nay response, however, such neglect would be your narrator's undoing. Herself spoke in speech so horrid, cursing entre nous given present selfishness. Lacking proper clairvoyance, mine feet kept at walking, brain turning strangely fuzzy. Shifting thoughts swirled throughout meaninglessly. Each word that passed wouldn't return, unreplaced through newly onset static.

Upon mother's bed does thou author lay, shapes around disappearing into nothingness. Darkness overtakes vision, feeble sentience fading. Regret consumes what is left, burning memories who shall never restore. Language deteriorating, leaving behind only thought bare body. Painful psychic degeneration, whichever solution available remains futile. Mental death appears imminent, survival unobtainable. Begging whatever being hath cursed father's son could save them, though mindlessness proves too strong. Inadequate altruism did indeed lead towards Hell, neither biblical nor afterlife, but an intellectual abyss. Conclusively, two words do break past even nothing itself, screaming out above all else.

God, help.